Airplane

rockets. All of that foam board got me thinking about making giant paper airplanes. It seemed easy, and I got carried away and couldn't stop."

To get started — using foam board, mylar tape and hot glue — Young built an 8-foot airplane and spent time figuring out how to balance it. It took about 24 hours over the course of a week to build. Then, he built a 12-foot plane that has to be assembled, piece-by-piece, each time he flies it because it won't fit in his van while fully assembled. This one took about 30 hours over two weeks to build.

"I've retrofitted my smaller airplane with model rocket motors," Young said. "And now I'm thinking about doing that with the big one to help give it a little extra push."

Young said regular-sized paper airplanes and his "jumbo jets" are very similar to one another — the difference is mainly the greater distance a larger plane can accomplish. (His 8-foot plane can fly 30 feet under hand power or 160 feet with the model rocket motor assist, while the 12-foot plane can fly 120 feet under hand power.)

Those watching the skies by the LeVitt Shell in Overton Park might see Young flying his super-sized, model rocket-fitted airplanes as a way to lighten things up during this pandemic. He usually flies them once a week, although he knows the not-too-far-off winter winds will eliminate flying until spring.

'Tinkering keeps me busy'

Young said he's always been "a tinkerer."

"I started a production company with my friend when we were in high school," Young recalled. "We had day jobs at an electronic supply company. That's where I began to learn about electricity. And I had access to wholesale electrical stuff, so that lent itself to more tinkering."

Fast forward to his adulthood. Young found his early interests led him to become a limited licensed electrician. He specializes in low voltage control through audio/video data. He is also a musician.

"I have always loved music," Young said. "So before I played professionally, as the drummer for The Delta Nomads, I frequently worked in entertainment."

He toured as a lighting director and lighting designer. He designed and built special effects for stage presentations. He designed a lighting control console.

"All of these things require organization, innovation and imagination," he said. "So you could say that I tinker for a living."

Young has a small workshop in his backyard. Before he built paper airplanes, he was maintaining an antique boat, a 1968 Starcraft — the 15-foot speedboat still has its original motor and trailer.

"It takes lots of work to maintain that boat, but generally it is not expensive to do so," Young said. "Boredom is my enemy, so I'm always looking for a way to have fun. I am a drummer, a percussionist, and I have a band, and a small home recording studio. I maintain the studio and the electronic drums, as well as dozens of percussion instruments. All that tinkering keeps me busy."
